'It's back to the values of 1950s

America'

When Lee moved his family to paradise, they felt like they'd come home at last

'Sure, the cost of living is low,' says International Living correspondent Lee Harrison. 'But life here is about so much more than just inexpensive.

'I often tell visitors that if they liked life in the 50s in the States - its values and lifestyle - they'll probably like Ecuador in the new millennium. In many ways it feels like we've been transported back in time to an era before lawyers and the government regulated our lives.

'The juice we drink still comes directly from our tropical fruit rather than a can. Bread comes fresh from the bakery every day - there are one or two on every block - and milk comes delivered to the door, dispensed from the back of the farmer's truck.

'Friends and families still drop by to visit...family outings remain the most important pastime...

'...and kids don't grow up glued to a Play Station. [Yet Ecuador] has everything we need - there's pure tap water, several ISPs, a symphony orchestra and theater, excellent health care, and a rich culture. The flowers, fresh fruits and hummingbirds are with us all year round.'

Sound like the way life ought to be? Let us send you details about Lee's paradise and others like it all over the world.
